章节摘录

Frances darling, I've been reading your letter over all day, its so dear, even the part that worried me. I imagine that tomorrow mornings mail will tell me what has happened and whether I really upset things. My mind has been constantly on the Cape—I can see you, but I don't know what you are doing and saying, and I want so dreadfully to know. Tell me that everything is all right, and tell me again. I've wanted to telephone, but I know you don't like the telephone, and besides I remember that yours is right out in the middle of everything and conversation is impossible. Damn the distance between us!

You won't get this until thirty-six hours after I write it. But remember that when I tell you now that I love you I shall be loving you even more by the time you read the words. Last Sunday I couldn't have believed that my love could ever be bigger and stronger than it was then—but its growing every hour. Can't you feel it?

Yesterday!

Couldn't do a stroke of work. I was exhausted—burned out—stunned. The terrific suspense and emotional strain and then the unbelievable happiness left me without much body or mind. But today I was myself again, only better than ever before; you were the motive for everything. I've never had so much energy. You have done that; don't stop. Haven't you a photograph or even a snapshot of yourself?

. I want to look at and touch, as I read and touch your letters; it helps bring you a little closer.
