章节摘录

Many of the topics and concerns which preoccupy applied linguists intersect and are shaped by these aspects of the organization of interaction. The remainder of this section will sketch several of these areas, and suggest their potential bearing on applied linguistic interests. Ensuing sections start from the applied linguistic end and touch on work which has drawn on conversational analytic resources. It is worthwhile to underscore a single underlying premise of this work which should be relevant to applied linguists as well. People use language and concomitant forms of conduct to do things, not only to transmit information; their talk and other conducts do things, and are taken as doing things such as requesting, offering, complaining, inviting, asking, telling, correcting, and other actions which talk-in-interaction can accomplish. By "actions" we are not referring to physical actions but to something accomplished through the talk, and we are referring not only to actions with familiar vernacular names like those just mentioned, but recognizable and describable actions without such names (such as confirming allusions). Understanding analytically what actions are being done by some unit of talk is not accessible to casual inspection and labeling. It requires examination of actual specimens of naturally occurring talk-in-interaction and analysis of what they are designed to accomplish by their speakers and are understood to have accomplished by their recipients, and what practices implement that design. On the one hand, the practices of talking in interaction are grounded jointly in dealing with the contingencies of managing to sustain talking together as an orderly arena of action, and on the other hand, the contingencies of producing and recognizing determinate actions, combinations of actions and sequences of actions. For those trying to understand a bit of talk, the key questions are: why and what is getting done by virtue of that conduct, done that way, in just that place?

This is the central issue for the parties to the talk- for its construction and understanding.
