章节摘录

Sprint 2 But that's just some of the many ways Sprint is green. The Green Office Blog talked with Alicia R. Martin, sustainability manager, real estate for Sprint, and Alex Hahn, Sprint community and public relations manager, about the company's green efforts. Martin shared a long list of green initiatives, including green parking, composting, an energy management program, waterless urinal trials, LED garage lighting trials, a bicycle commuter incentive program, prairie grass restoration, natural pesticides, green cleaning and discounted refills for drinks in reusable cups. 3 An important part of Sprint's green office program is executive-level support. Even though the company has been focused on the environment for more than a decade, CEO Dan Hesse, has made it a top priority. "He made it clear to all that the environment is and will be a key priority for Sprint," Martin explained. This kind of executive support, she added, is one of the best ways Sprint has been able to maintain its focus on green efforts. 4 In this down economy, businesses may be tempted to cut "unnecessary" items, such as recycling programs or switching to energy-efficient light bulbs. But Sprint has shown green efforts can save companies a sizable amount of money. 5 Sprint has removed all foam cups from break rooms across the nation and offered reusable cups to interested employees. The savings: $135,000 a year. And this effort kept 5 million cups a year out of the trash. 6 Last year, the company implemented Sprint Mobile Workforce, which allows employees the opportunity to work from home. Not only does it foster work/life balance and give employees greater flexibility, it saved Sprint $20 million every year.
