章节摘录

插图：Shanghai is developing so rapidly that its urban map has to be upgraded every six months. One obvious phenomenon is that the green belts are getting increasingly larger. At the end of 2002, per-capita green areas reached seven square meters and the coverage rate amounted to 27 percent. Per-capita landscaped areas in Shanghai have grown from newspaper-size to room-size, leading every large and medium-sized city in China. In early years of the 21st century, Shanghai won a "City Sustainable Development Contribution" award from the United Nations. Like other international metropolises, Shanghai is densely populated, but has found ways to develop green areas. Existing green areas are fully utilized. Intimidating brick walls enclosing some public institutions have been demolished or replaced with railings, to share the greenery within. As well, to their merit, nearly all the Shanghai parks are free of charge to visitors. The city has taken on a new look. Like many great cities, Shanghai has its own mother river ——the Huangpu, which has always nourished the people on its two banks. The Huangpu River, totaling 114 kilometers long, rises in the Taihu Lake, Jiangsu/Province and flows through the urban area of Shanghai, and then empties into the mouth of the Yangtze River at the northeast Shanghai. Touring the river in a pleasure boat, you can enjoy the picturesque scenery along both the riversides, as you are transported between the city's past, present and future.
