章节摘录

"In South Korea , the Internet has become a babysitter , " said LeeKyong Ok , a professor at Duksung Womens University in Seoul. Online role-playing games , where participants make friends and band together in clans , have a strong appeal to Koreans. "One problem with those games is that you build your online persona through countless hours of battles , and you develop a huge emotional attachment to your game character , " said Chang WooMin , a one-time online gamer. Parents report that their children steal money and do not come home for days and even weeks , practically living in Internet cafes , and sometimes they refuse to look for jobs and play games all night and sleep during the day. The authorities require Internet cafes to keep their distance from schools , and they open camps for teenage addicts and distribute ( 散发 ) booklets on the dangers of game addiction. In addition , they are training hundreds of counselors , who visit schools and Internet cafes. In the 28 , 000 Internet cafes in South Korea , minors ( 未成年人 ) are banned from entry after 10 p.m. The authorities have even discussed reducing the points of gamers who play for more than three consecutive ( 连续的 ) hours. But such talks have produced no agreement , among concerns that such restrictions would harm a high-growth industry and worsen the problem of teenagers stealing adult online identification numbers. "Sooner or later we will be able to announce our measures , " the minister for information and communication , Rho Jun Hyung , said at a news conference in May. "Since South Korea is one of the most active and developed countries in the Internet , the world is paying great attention to what policy we will adopt on this problem."
