前言

Although more than twenty years have elapsed, the memory of my setting foot on Chinese soil for the first time ever remains vivid.. In the chilly February or March, 1987, I arrived at Peking University for a short-term education program. The university and its surrounding areas have since evolved into a concentration of IT ( information technology ) industries, dubbed the "Silicon Valley of China. Back then, however, it was a sleepy village where donkey- and horse-pulled carts rolled up and down the road unhurriedly. White poplars and locust trees lining the road were leafless and dark clouds were hanging over the city. The seemingly desolate landscape made me feel a little bit uneasy. However, something cheered me up; it was just like a brilliant beam penetrating the thick clouds to eliminate my unease. An acquaintance introduced me to a Chinese family. Although we were meeting for the first time, the family was extremely welcoming and hospitable to me a Japanese person who spoke broken Chinese. They said, "Let's make some dumplings together." When the dumplings were ready to serve they said, "Please help yourself." They were treating me like an old friend. Back then in Japan, information on China was scarce. Probably as a result of inadequate understanding, China was even described as a country hiding behind a bamboo curtain." Who were the people living in China ? What kind of life were they living ? What were they thinking about ? Nothing was known. Anyway, it turned out that all people I met in.
