章节摘录

版权页：插图：As is vividly and interestingly depicted in the picture above, in the middle stand two individuals, showing us a striking contrast between two kinds of people: the self-satisfied person with little learning, shaking no to the pot of knowledge; while the other more learned person, thirsting for knowledge, welcomes it with open arms. There has been a heated discussion in the newspaper re-cently. Apparently, the thought-provoking drawing indicates that people shouldn't be satisfied with knowledge they have got but need to preserve the attitude of yearning for knowledge. (Simple as the picture is, the symbolic meaning is as deep as ocean. Just as an Arab proverb once said, where there is pursuing spirit, there is more precious knowledge.) The author's real purpose is not the fact itself, but to lead us to find what hides behind the iceberg. The latter spirit is indispensably important in the times of knowledge explosion, when the news, facts, opinions even rumors have been bombarding us from every corner of the world. Thomas L. Friedman, the author of best seller The World Is Flat : A Brief History of the Twenty-first Century, insists that knowledge has pull the world into a single global network which has the possibility of ushering an amazing era of prosperity and innovation. That is to say, people must absorb new knowledge so as to accommodate themselves to the changing society, or they would be supplanted by those who have more knowledge. Therefore, if you want to be a winner in the world where new things take place every day, you should not be content with what you have already learnt; you need to keep learning and update your knowledge and skills all the time.
