章节摘录

So, what should today's federal, state, and local workers employers do? First, recognize that training and development are not costs but investments in the development of the employee and the success of the agency. In fact, with nearly one in four government workers scheduled to retire in the next five years, current employees are the best ones to ensure that an agency can continue meeting its mission. The Performance Assessment Network uncovered that those employees who participated in training and development opportunities provided by their employer were significantly more engaged, and significantly less unengaged than those employees who were not given training opportunities-and employee engagement leads directly to the types of behaviors desired of employees. Second, do a better job of selecting employees, ensuring a good fit in the organization. With more than one in five new state/local employees leaving voluntarily or being fired by their organization, all government agencies need to do a better job of finding the right person for the right job at the right time, the definition of "recruiting," the first of the "4 Rs of Workforce Engagement." Third, do something simple. Create mentoring programs as part of an organizational on-boarding process, select and train the mentors, match mentors with "mentees," and create incentives for both to succeed. This inexpensive program improves the productivity of new employees as well as their retention, and teaches the mentors supervisory skills that might be of benefit to an organization in the future. Fourth, make sure that front line supervisors and managers understand the importance of providing training for the short term and the long term. Remember, employees quit a boss, not a company. Fifth, realize that training doesn't have to be directly related to the day-to-day job. Giving employees time to join a not-for-profit board, paying for ongoing professional certification, even giving lessons to specific groups of employees on speaking in front of others provides job enrichment and development opportunities that will enhance that employees engagement to your organization. Sixth, help others in your organization recognize the linkage between employee engagement and decreased cost, increased customer satisfaction, and improved financial results. An academic study examining the linkages between employees, customers and financial performance found a direct link between improvements in a federal government agency's "work climate"-the satisfaction of the employees-and a significant improvement in employee productivity.
