章节摘录

The poets during the Second World War were drastically different from those Georgian poets of the First World War. In place of high-sounding patriotism and idealism, this generation of poets, prepared by the messages of disillusion and despair sent by modernist writers, expressed their tiredness of and disgust at the horrors and absurdities of the war. Also, the Second World War poets formed no particular subgenre in literary history, partly because, as Keith Douglas (1920-1944) put it, hell cannot be let loose twice and almost all that a modern poet on active service is inspired to write, would be tautological to what had been described by the Great War Poets. ...
