章节摘录

插图：“Applying for foreign universities should be a chance to train high school graduates and to provide opportunities for them to explore their options,” explains Fiona Yu, a Chinese teacher at the International School of Beijing. “However, there are too many outside resources that interfere in this process. [They] basically provide services that will help students complete all the pieces of information they need to apply for foreign universities. They even help them write their resume, undermining the original objective of college application.” These agencies have a large influence over the schools that students select. The university rankings that they provide and the schools that they advertise to the students basically determine the list of universities that the students look into. The advertisements also imply that the schools know the “secrets” to admission into top these top universities, which attract many parents. Most Chinese parents highly value these rankings, which further emphasizes how significant it is for a Chinese student to graduate with a degree from a top college, giving them an advantage in their job search. Even students studying at top Chinese universities are attracted to opportunities in the U. S. Dante Lai, an undergraduate attending Peking University, talks of wanting to go abroad. He stayed in China because his college entrance exam score got him into one of China’s top schools, but he says “studying in a famous university in the U.S.” is still one of his dreams.
