章节摘录

Passage one Questions 52 to 56 are based on the following passage.

Because of satellite links which now enable broadcast news organizations to originate live programming from any part of the globe the entire world is becoming one giant sound stage for television news. As a result, Marshall McLuhan's reference to the post-television world as being a single "global village" is gaining new acceptance and Shakespeare's famous line, "All the World's a stage", has taken on an interesting new twist in meaning. But, beyond the philosophical dimensions of global television communications there are some dramatic, political implications. Even before today's worldwide satellite links were possible, the growing effect of broadcast news technology on national and international politics was becoming increasingly evident.

Because television is a close-up medium and a medium that seems to most readily involve emotions, it is most effective when it is revealing the plights of people. It was probably the appalling footage (英尺数) of the Nazi death camps that first demonstrated the power of motion pictures and television to affect the collective consciousness of a world audience. In the United States during the 50s and 60s the power of television to stir the consciousness of large numbers of people was demonstrated in another way. Night after night graphic news footage of the civil rights struggle was brought into U.S. homes. Years later, this role was to take on a new and even more controversial dimension during the Vietnam war. Reading about war was one thing; but war took on a deeper and more unsavory (令人讨厌的) dimension when it was exported directly into U.S.
