章节摘录

2 Read and listen to a conversation about the future. 1 What is the specific topic that these people are discussing?

2 Which of them is a pessimist?

Which is an optimist?

Whatabout the others?

ALAN: In the end science is likely to solve a lot of theworlds problems... I mean, medical advances andthings like that..., theyll cut down diseases. I heard a geneticist on the radio talking about howthey might be able to get rid of hereditary diseasesaltogether in the next ten years. PAT: Yes ... might. But there are new diseases all thetime. And, anyway, science creates problems ... itdoesnt Just solve them. TIM: What do you mean?

PAT: Well, take genetic engineering, for instance. Thesame research thats intended to fight diseases hasother uses as well. ALAN: Like what?

PAT: Well, theyre not only finding out about genes that cause diseases ... theyre also going to knowwhich ones give us the colour of our hair and eyes. In theory they already know how to create maleor female children.,, and now theyre saying there might be a gene that affects intelligence!

TIM: Wait a moment. Whats wrong with that?

PAT: Whats wrong with it?

Everyonell want the samekind of children. And in some countries that Ilmean mostly male children ..., and all intelligent, of course ... and in some countries ... SARA: Just let me tell you something. When I have children, which Im not thinking of doing yet, if science can give me the perfect child, then I intend to have the perfect child... I think its a great idea. PAT: You see!

Well have a world full of perfect people. And therell be too many men!

ALAN: Do you really believe that?

You cant be certainthat people will choose their babies characteristics. It would be awful if we lost the variety-I mean, ifpeople were all the same - but perhaps that wonthappen. I don't think it will.
