内容概要

Though the Internet has increased vastly our capacity to know things , to communicate with others and to get information quickly and widely , some reactions among US towards its utilization in culture teaching and learning are typically emotion—driven . There are those in whom it evokes anxiety and confusion . There are also those whose uncritically enthusiastic embracing of the Internet may produce equally negative results . The Internet links distant places and diverse areas of cultures in new productive ways . It allows US to form and sustain communities for work , play , and learning in ways unimaginable just a decade ago . It changes the relationship between people and knowledge . It quickens the steps of the globalization . Yet , the full applications of the Internet in culture teaching do not mean the abandonment of the traditional pedagogy . The Internet has the capacity to enhance and enrich teaching . But an intoxicated fascination with its technology at the expense of sound pedagogy can only be harmful , for all its superficial attractions .
